„The School System in Canada: Inclusive and Exclusive policies and procedures, 1960 - 1990“

Begrüßung: Prof. Dr. Oliver Böhm-Kasper

Canada is a federal state where education is a provincial responsibility. Each province governs education differently and each has a series of regulations as to how special education processes work. The Province of Ontario is one of the innovators in this regard and this is where the focus of this presentation and research lies. Decisions about the inclusion or exclusion of children with special needs in mainstream schooling are linked to different provincial priorities. The aim of this presentation then is to look at the historical evolution of these special education assessment policies and procedures, as well as at the implications they have for inclusion and exclusion of children in local provincially funded schools. As a qualitative study, this work analyzes archival data from the 1960s to the 1990s. The presentation will look at brief overviews of some of the individual provinces and specifically at procedures in the Province of Ontario and in the Toronto District School Board.
